Johnson & Johnson: Mid Year Review 2016

Working with memories Historians working in museums are concerned first to recognize and record memories through objects and oral history and, secondly, to provide a place where individuals and groups cannot only share, compare and even confront memories, but also relate these to broader histories.

Con Man: The Making of a Monster

Perhaps for the academically minded, his wide all-encompassing spread, his endless bon mots at the cost of professional tone, his cantankerous asides on modernity and other scholar's writings, his armchair psychologizing of historical figures, and his partial adherence to the out of style "great man" theory of history is too disconcerting and old school to be dismissed. First, this course will not only sharpen students' technical skills but will mainly emphasizes on the connections between those skills and economic intuitions.
